SHORT STORY FOR EVENING HOURS

THE BLUE GUM MYSTERY

The Blue Gum steamship was on her voyage from Australia to London with 170 passengers and a considerable cargo of mutton and wool. There were two passengers that were the cynosure of the eyes and thoughts of all the rest, and these two were Rev. James Garland and his young wife. It was plain to experienced married people that the couple were quite new to the business of marriage; they were presumably on their honeymoon. The presumption was discovered to be correct by judicious matrons, who made judicious and sympathetic inquiries of the young wife. It is well known that a number of people shut in together for a long voyage must relieve its tedium by incessant gossip about each other. The honeymoon couple were a godsend, and the discussion of them was all the more interesting that the men could not endure the man and the women did not like the woman.

"Men are so mercenary," sighed Miss McWhirter to Mr. Dicks, the second officer.

"More particularly parsons," said Mr. Dicks, softly.

But there was one thing especially which continued to keep the reverend couple a center of interest; it was supposed that Mr. Garland treated his wife no better than he ought.

"Oh, James! Don't! Don't! How cruel you are!"

That was one of the things young Marlow said he had overheard, and, young Marlow ought to know, for he spent much of his time in trying to catch the bride's eye and hold it.

Then came the sensational incident. In the Indian ocean the Blue Gum encountered a storm. The ship was in danger, but the hatches had to be bolted down, and passengers were forbidden to come on deck. The great waves rolled and broke in thunder on the decks and swished in salt cascades over all obstructions, but the steamship rolled and forced through all like a great whale. The bride during the storm kept closely to her cabin, and once the cry came from it pleading into the saloon. "Oh, I can't endure it! I can't! I can't!" A few minutes later Mr. Garland came forth and voluntarily explained.

"She's afraid of the storm," he said, "and it has got on her nerves. I hope it will soon abate. But we are in the hands of God."

"Hypocrite!" murmured young Marlow, and the others looked at each other with lifting eyebrows.

In two or three days the storm zone had been passed, the wind sank, the sea calmed, the sun shone and the passengers came eagerly on deck and stayed there as long as possible. It was a moonlight night. The air was soft and balmy. Miss McWhirter reclined on a deck chair and gazed up into the luminous sky, while Mr. Dicks softly extracted something of a tune from an old flute, when suddenly the company was startled by Mr. Garland striding in among them and demanding in a husky tone:

"Where is my wife?"

"Have you seen her?" demanded Mr. Dicks, turning upon young Marlow.

"I thought you commonly knew her whereabouts," said Mr. Dicks.

"Has no one seen her?" again cried the husband, casting his eyes around upon the company. "She was in our cabin half an hour ago, and now I can't find her anywhere."

The whole company were on their feet ready with suggestions. Perhaps she had gone to look at the engine; the ladies were fond of gazing at the steel timbers of the ship; perhaps she was hiding "for a lark," like the lady of "The Mistletoe Bough." But behind all suggestions lurked the dark thought that perhaps she had gone overboard. Officers and men searched every conceivable hiding place in the ship.

"My poor wife! My dear wife!" cried the distracted husband. "She has not been herself since the storm began."

"Shame!" muttered young Marlow aside.

"Where can she be gone?" the husband continued. "Do you think she can have gone overboard, captain?"

"That's just what I do think, sir," said the captain, "and there is no use now our putting about for her."

Some time later the captain and others were darkly discussing the matter in the smoking room, with the sojace of a drink or two.

"The question is," murmured the captain, "if he did, why did he? What for?"

"Well," said a bald-headed passenger, who seldom spoke, "if what I've heard be true he had a good reason."

"What have you heard?" asked the captain. "Come!"

"His wife told my wife, in confidence, that before they left Sydney she and her husband had made wills in each other's favor—in case anything should happen on the voyage. Something has happened."

"The confidence trick in married life," exclaimed another passenger. "You often hear of it."

"Do you?" said the captain.

The captain was put out. He did not like the situation, but he did not see how it could be remedied until home was reached. And so day after day passed, and suspicion of Mr. Garland was in full flower. He was avoided and hardly spoken to, and, to tell the truth, he seemed to feel it and to be pained by it, but he said nothing. At length the Blue Gum steamed up the Thames and anchored off Gravesend to wait for the tide. Rev. Mr. Garland made preparations to leave the ship.

"You must excuse me, sir," said the captain, "but I think you do better to go on with us to the dock."

"But my destination, captain," said Mr. Garland, "is a little place in Kent, close by here."

"I think, for your own sake, sir, and for the sake of the ship," insisted the captain, "you must go on with us to the dock."

"I must go on!"

"I think, sir, you must."

"This, I suppose, captain, is in accordance with the suspicion with which I have been persecuted since my poor wife's unfortunate disappearance."

"Not persecuted, sir; not a word has been said," protested the captain.

"No," indignantly cried Mr. Garland, "if my word had been said I might have answered it. I did not expect sympathy, but surely I have a right to be treated as a free man and not as a condemned prisoner. My papers are at your service for any inquiry you may wish to make."

"It is not my business, sir," said the captain, "to make any inquiry; it is the law. All I have to do is to tell what has happened and to say, meaning you, sir, 'Here is the person that knew all about the lady.'"

So Mr. Garland acquiesced in the request—which was almost an order—that he should go on to the dock. And for the issue they were all agog. It had been whispered that the captain had telegraphed from Gravesend to Scotland Yard, and sure enough, as soon as the ship was berthed in the Albert dock a man jumped on board and said: "Tell the captain that Inspector Sharp wishes to see him." Never was a vessel more difficult to clear of its passengers. While the inspector talked on the bridge with the captain Mr. Garland kept himself shut up in his cabin.

At length the captain and the inspector descended to the saloon. The captain knocked at the door of Mr. Garland's cabin. That gentleman evidently apprehended the situation at once.

"I can guess what you are come about," said he.

"All right, sir," said the captain; "this is Inspector Sharp of Scotland Yard."

"I would like a few words in private with you, sir," said the inspector.

"I should prefer what we have to say to be said in public," said Mr. Garland. "I have been under suspicion," he continued with indignation, "and I should like my fellow passengers to hear all that I have to say—as I have often overheard what they have had to say. You are at liberty," he continued, more calmly to the inspector, "to look over all my luggage and papers, but it may facilitate matters if I submit some papers at once."

He returned to his cabin and came out with a bundle of docketed papers in his hand.

"These," said he, beginning to undo the tapes, "will show you that my wife had property in New South Wales worth about £200 per annum. These others"—untying another lot—"will show you that she recently came into property in Kent worth about £1500 per annum. Further—"

But at that point there came an astonishing interruption.

"Captain," cried an excited voice into the saloon, "will you come? The lady has been found."

Then there was a wild scurry forth. The captain followed the messenger, and Mr. Garland followed the captain, while many passengers crowded after on into the now silent engine rooms and still on into a smaller room, where a little engine was noisily at work. By pushing and squeezing a narrow doorway was passed through into a chamber with the temperature of the polar regions. Passing through that chamber an inner door was reached, and the leader unbarred it and held high a lantern. All who could looked on a remarkable scene. White and cold as Greenland was the interior. Timber and walls were loaded with hoar-frost, and all around were full cotton bags frozen stiff.

"Ah, my poor wife!" broke from Mr. Garland, as he staggered into a corner and knelt by the stiff corpse of a woman, which was hardly distinguishable from the frozen cotton bags. "My own, poor girl! My darling!"

The spectators moved away, silent and humble. Many were the speculations as to how the unfortunate lady had got shut in there, but the only plausible explanation was that in a half-delirious condition she had left her cabin the day after the storm and had wandered into the refrigerating chamber while the men were engaged in resetting the cargo disarranged by the rolling of the vessel.—J.
